such a narrow escape from capture, December 21, 1884.

Mosby, in company with Tom Love, had followed a secouting party composed of parts of two New York cavalry resiments, under comand of Major Frazer, watching their movements until they halted and went into camp at Rectortown just after dark. Thinking them settled for the night, the Colonel and Love left their trail and passing by the house of Mr. Lake, where they were always assured of a hearty welcome, went in to get a cup of coffee, declining his companion's offer to stand guard, thinking the Yankees were sleeping in camp, where he had left them, three miles away. They had only bivous acked there long enough to warm and feed their Borses, however, and had then resumed their march on the road taken by Mosby and Love.

They reached Mr. Lake's place while the household was at supper, and quietly surrounding the house, comemneed firing through the windows into the supper foom.

com. Some one said:

"Oh! he's done for!"
The surgeon examined him, and pronounced him beyond all earthly hope.
Not satisfied yet, the redoutable Major Frazer pressed eagerly forward, saying:
"I'm somewhat of a dector myself," and after a critical examination of the wound, pronounced him already dying.
"Who are you?" he asked.
"Lieutemant Johnson, of the First Virginia cavalry," gasped the once gallant guerilla, now in the last throos.
The lakes declare they had never seen the man before he came to the house just now, begging for something to eat.
"Well, we'll let him die in peace," and

"Well, we'll let him die in peace," and they went away, carrying Tom Love, the horses and Mosby's bat, boots and coat with them. Hardly were they out of hearing when Mosby quit dring, and walked laughingly into the room where the family were deploring his untimely
